I believe Ecan should remove all reference to woodburner type and instead conduct an extensive education campaign on how to operate all units within their most efficient and cleanest parameters. Distance itself from the fundamentally flawed 24 hour PM10 target and negotiate (or do what ever is required) to have this changed to a more sensible 12 month cumulative, or PM2.5 target.

Although Christchurch air quality has improved in recent years there does not appear to have been a corresponding decrease in air pollution related hospital admission rates. Indeed, the Parliamentary Commissioner for the Environment, WHO and many others, acknowledge that short term PM10 exposure is not a significant health risk. This is further born out by the similar admission rates between Christchurch (with its known inversion layer problems) and Wellington hospitals.

It would appear that computer modeling for associated health statistics are "out of step" with reality. To heat older homes efficiently and reduce the reliance on electricity. the use of quality, environmentally sustainable wood, as a fuel, should be encouraged.
