Reasons comment:

Surely everyone knows that burning coal is very dangerous for the planet as a major source of climate change, while its mining also causes water and soil pollution. Isn't this enough to stop the activity? Don't you care about the future our children and grandchildren will inherit, just because our generation want its profits to continue? An investment in regenerative farming research and education would be a better use of the money rural councils will have to spend on ameliorating the negative environmental effects that will ensue if this project were to go ahead - and are currently ensuing from pollution to the river and the lake, for example. And why should private business be allowed to continue to make its environmental costs public?
